

The National Railway Museum presence in Shildon, Co Durham is the result of collaborative working between my team in York and London and the local authority team lead by Phil Ball.

Locomotion: the National Railway Museum in Shildon brought together two organisations with different project objectives working towards a common purpose.

The National Railway Museum has benefited significantly from working with Phil who was able to use his detailed knowledge of the Northern Region and excellent network of contacts to help formulate creative solutions. As a result, funding for a multi-million pound project was brought together and Locomotion has successfully met the objectives of both partners, winning national and international awards in the process. It has been an exemplar of successful partnership working.

Andrew Scott, Director, National Railway Museum